As soon as the party arrived at Windermere, Mr. Bolton had looked out for Tom, expecting that he would be glad to join him; but already Joe Fisher had got hold of him. He saw them together on the lake during the morning--already so excited, he feared some accident would happen to their boat. After that he knew nothing of their proceedings, except hearing incidentally that the whole party were said to have spent the afternoon in a low public-house, drinking and card-playing. With the utmost kindness, Mr. Bolton helped the widow to get her son upstairs and to bed, merely remaining afterwards for a few words of prayer with the broken-hearted mother, then hastening home, lest his family should be made anxious by his non-appearance at the expected time. But I ll look in to-morrow after...
